

Copyright

The University of Essex Research Repository encourages all academics and researchers to retain the copyright on their work. You give your permission to keep your work in a current format and to freely distribute electronic copies of it – nothing more.

When a publisher of journals accepts a paper, it is usual practice to sign over the copyright. However, uploading the same paper to the University of Essex Research Repository will not necessarily infringe that copyright, depending on the publisher.

Copyright checks are part of the upload process and all papers submitted are checked. In fact, most publishers do allow copies of papers that have been refereed, but not yet formatted for final publication, to be uploaded. You also have the option of granting the publisher a license to publish your work, which means that you retain the copyright.

If you have concerns about plagiarism of your work due to the open access nature of the University of Essex Research Repository, it is important to remember that all published work is open to plagiarism. In reality, open access makes it easier to compare electronic sources, so detecting plagiarism and protecting your intellectual property rights is more, not less likely.

Research Repository

Bringing a global audience to your research

<http://repository.essex.ac.uk>

The Research Repository is the global online repository of the University of Essex that will boost the visibility and impact of your research.

The repository can host the publication details and the full text of published research carried out by our research community, and all the material uploaded is open access and available free of charge.

It is not a substitute for peer-reviewed journals, but a tool that has been developed specifically to host research material online that has already been published. In doing so, it makes your publicly-funded research publicly available.

Global visibility

By uploading your research to the University of Essex Research Repository you will make it available to the global scholarly community on a scale that is impossible with paper.

When you upload your research it will be exposed to Google and other search engines as well as specialist repository harvesting services such as OALster.

Centralised storage

Once uploaded to the Research Repository your research is stored in a single, central searchable space, rather than being distributed across many publishers' websites.

A link from your personal or departmental webpage to <http://repository.essex.ac.uk> can make the full text of your papers readily available, rather than just the citation as is often the case.

Preserving your research

The University of Essex Research Repository preserves your research papers indefinitely. This is in contrast with what is offered by many publishers who may choose to remove your work when it suits their purposes.

Easy access

Your students may have difficulty accessing publishers' websites because of licensing restrictions.

Putting your work on the University of Essex Research Repository for them to view directly not only removes that restriction, but actively supports their learning.

Fast uploading

You can upload your research papers onto the repository today. Subject to copyright and other agreements with the publisher, you may deposit either a pre-print (the draft you submit to a journal) or a post-print (the finalised text after refereeing).
